UX Design Study

By Ben Hunt

UX Design

Methodology/Purpose

- Identify visceral reactions like gut feelings, first thoughts, emotional resonance etc, to refine the logo at a glance
- Identify behavioral reactions like patterns of perceptions, thoughts about action, to gauge utility and effectiveness of the logo
- Identify reflective reactions like conclusions, understanding of the underlying message, representation of the product or person etc, to refine vision.

- The interviewees were prompted verbally in reaction to one by one slides of the 3 logo options, and then a side by side.
- The questions were intended to gauge the three types of reactions utilizing different angles
- Questions, and organic deviations were designed to tease out useful perceptions
  - Did the logo feel polished, and effective?
  - How was the design language?
  - What would the participants do after seeing it?

Participants

Astrum (15-25)

Undergraduate student pursuing a double-major in business and math, relevant experience in business networking settings.

Ryan (15-25)

Undergraduate Student Studying Biology on the Pre-med track, relevant experience across design projects for local business and high school clubs

Carson (15-25)

Undergraduate Student pursuing a double major in Political Science and Biology, relevant knowledge of the person being represented by the logo, and honesty

Option 1

Participants felt the logo was off, the weight of the magnifying glass and the incomplete letter left them unsettled. However that intrigue generated made them think it was organic, interesting, or worthwhile. The color was helpful, as it did not detract from the message and felt professional

Option 2

Participants felt the logo was extremely thought-provoking, the abstract lines left them wanting to know more, and piece together the meaning behind it. The color had mixed reactions, some though the bold black was too heavy, while others thought it added cohesion and visual intrigue. The overall presentation felt unprofessional in an endearing way

Option 3

Participants thought the logo was extremely sterile and professional, the point of color and contrast felt adequate and assumed. The color was useless, as it just fit into a predetermined corporate mold, it didn't add or detract. The overall impression was boredom, all said they needed an associated context to draw a conclusion about how they would engage.

LOGO

Final Design

The final logo blends the intentionality of the first and third options with the abstractness and organic impressions of the second, it's a compromise between legibility and visual intrigue. The text was changed to be legible, and better reflect the person represented. Initial impressions of the logo were extremely positive.

Appendix

https://docs.google.com/document/d/1ZNfvAgCOmj-8rYcM883lLtBetx3e7lroIfO8b0PdfS8/edit?tab=t.0
Script (Contains the script, and transcripts)

https://docs.google.com/document/d/1q8jx5td1fdzCRw688M_IY-vc5gcPkrlukobcWKM2Opw/edit?tab=t.0
Transcript 1

https://docs.google.com/document/d/1nHGK220iY_pi9-Vh45G40Ym0j5xTqqSeDpVCnxGJxcA/edit?tab=t.0
Transcript 2

https://docs.google.com/document/d/19Fyi6d8AgsetzimqBL7g1UFmEG9wFIrMe2en9BqH4Iw/edit?tab=t.0
Transcript 3